SUBLINE ON THE RIDICULOUS. At Tammany Hall one night Mike Walsh had the good fortune to see his candidate for Sachem elected over an opponent whom he did not like, whereupon he arose and soured aloft as follows. Louis Gaylord Clark reports it: When the Temple of Minerva, at Athens in Greece, was near its completion," said he "the chief sculptors of that classic land were notified by proposals from the authorities, that on a certain day, a year afterwards, each of the artists was expected to have on the ground a marble statue of the goddess to whom the world-renowed temple was dedicated, to crown the apex of the lofty

"The day came-a day such as the skies of Greece alone could show. Of the statues which appeared in the front of the temple, one was of such exquisite proportions and beautiful finish that it was hailed with loud acclamations of appliance by all who looked upon it; while a second, apparently incomplete, so rough and unseemly was its surface and so ungainly its proportions, was received with hisses and other obsteperons tokens of disapprobation, and wheeled aside with contempt.

"Meantime, the raising apparatus was attached to the beautiful figure of the goddess; and as it gradually rose to a level with the heads of the assembled populace, admiration of its perfect leveliness found vent in applause still louder and more vehement than when it first reached the consecrated ground. But at it rose higher, tion and beauty, until it looked more like a marble doll than a statue of the great

Minerva. "Take it down! shouted the crowd, who not ten minutes before had been so enthusiastically sounding its praises. 'Take it down! 'tis an infant goddess!' And down it came at length, and was hustled out of Here Mike took a drink of water from the tumbler before him; and with flashing eyes, distended nostrils, and his whole coun tenance and manner beaming with earnestness and solemnity, continued:

"And now," said Mike, 'some thoughtful and considerate Grecian called out: "Raise the other the other statue!" "Forthwith the spirit of the whole assemblage changed, and the discarded figure so sneered at and comdemed a few moments before, was soon elevated above their heads, and slowly uscending towards the top of the temple. As it arose higher and higher, that which on the ground seemed rough, unbewn and uncomely, melted into lines of grace and beauty; and when it was lowered upon its podestal, and topped the lofty apex, you would have thought the divinity herself had descended to crown the mighty temple, so exquisite was its work manship, so perfect its proportions! It had reached the place it was created to
